COMMUNITY

The Carleton Community
(and other myths)

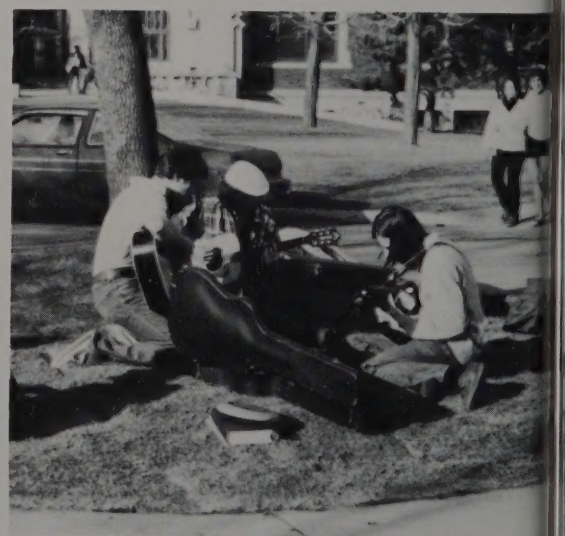

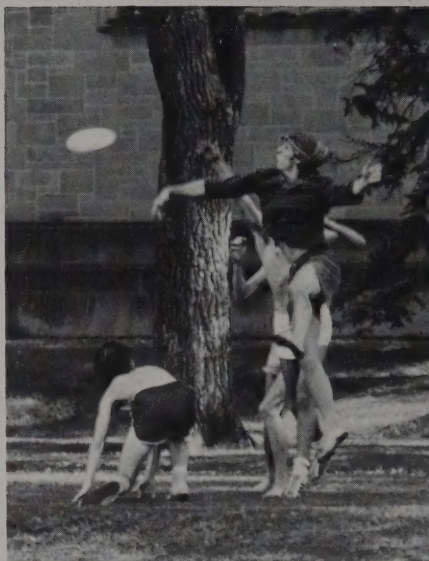

Community (ke-miu'ni-ti) 1. A body politic, as a village, town, city or state. 2. The public; any body of persons having common interests. 3. A sharing or participation.

"The Carleton Community", it's a slippery idea. Difficult to pin down. It defies definition, perhaps because it describes an entity whose boundaries and structure are anything but precise. The College is so many things at once: an allegedly reputable institution of academic endeavor, a serene wasteland of arctic beauty, a continuing (but always changing battle between institutional and radical politics, comps, a phantasmagoric maze of groups, clubs, committees, associations, and special interests: in short, anything but a community. How could any population so confusing, so consistently at odds with itself claim to be a "community"?

And yet the claim is still made, fueled by a very common feeling that there is something, well ... special about Carleton. Something unique, something that makes sense (if not order) out of the confusion. The College is an ubiquitous presence; in all its manifestations and various extensions, where it touches one, it touches all. And where all are touched, there is a shared sense, a commonality of experience. A community.

Look at it this way: Each Spring term there comes a day (early in the term in a good year, late in the term in a bad one) when the sun suddenly ups and shines for what seems like the first time since the previous September. The snow is gone and under the sun's gentle prodding, the ground slowly warms to a point where it seems a sin against all the gods of land and sky to keep your shoes on. Stereo speakers appear in dorm windows like rare flowers that only bloom once each year. Suddenly everyone is in shorts; ev-everyone is barefoot; everyone has a frisbee (or a softball, or football, or what-ever) and everyone is drinking in the delights of that most joyous celebration — the First Day of Spring. It's Carleton's own version of a Dionysiac festival, a bacchanal that can be found nowhere else on the earth.

"A sharing ..." How often has this happened? You're sitting in an airport or some other unlikely place, when all of a sudden you notice that the person sitting across from you and two seats down is vaguely familiar. A moment or two of thought — of course! Econ 10 Fall term. She sat in the front row next to the premed. It all comes back. A word or two of introduction, a few memories of the class, and all of a sudden you've discovered a new friend.

"... or participation." Try explaining Rottblatt to someone who has never attended Carleton and most likely you'll get one of those "Well-gee-it must-be-nice" expressions that people wear when they're too polite to tell you how bored they are. If, on the other hand, you could plop them down on libefield, with a bottle of Hauenstein in one hand, and a Spaulding mitt (the Willie Mays autographed model) proudly worn on the other, then they might begin to understand the mystery and the glory of the game. But only then.

The population of a small college is a strange thing. Hundreds of people, all with different interests, different backgrounds, different goals, are brought together into very close quarters and forced to co-exist. It seems impossible: there are too many cliques, too much provincialism, too many people who are just too different. But it works, somehow. Jocks room with geeks, a studio art major plays Wombat with a pre-med, a small-town boy from darkest Iowa puts together an oral presentation with a city-boy from Vienna. The differences don't disappear, but they do begin to seem less important. Maybe because, once you've whiled away a stretch of time here, you start to realize the people you know here and the things you've done with them have affected you, changed you. And you in turn have affected them. And that what has changed you has been your time at Carleton.

A college is not a community; a college is an institution. What the college does is give people a chance to make a community, by giving them a chance to share in an infinite number of joys, pains and experiences. Not a bad basis for a community on the whole.

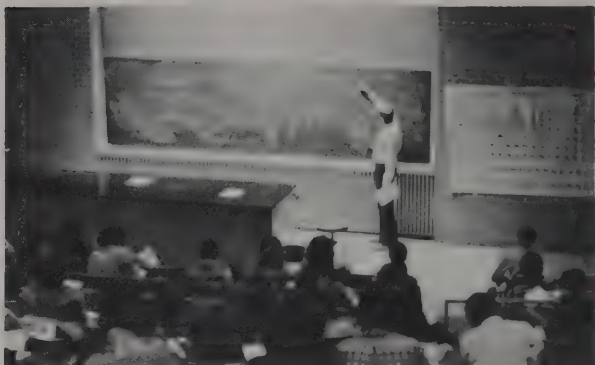

SPECIAL EVENTS

Although you would never realize it upon first glance, the gouges in the trees near Burton are obscure reminders of a milestone in the college's history:

Strike

Although you would never realize it upon first glance, the gouges in the trees near Burton are obscure reminders of a milestone in the college's history: its first strike by unionized shop, housekeeping and foodservice employees. The gouges — caused by the erratic lawn-mowing of a top administrator — recall a time when the Carleton Community was bitterly divided. The union claimed it was being "ignored" by the college. The college thought the strike was "unnecessary". Students and professors were inconvenienced, puzzled and impatient.

Confusion was the one word that aptly described the campus mood. Student mailboxes were regularly stuffed with letters of explanation, rebuttal and accusation from both the union and the college; it became virtually impossible to decipher what really went on in closed-door sessions between negotiators and mediators.

Blame was transferred easily: the strike was caused by the administration's attitude, or was it because of the verbal abuse of the college's negotiator? The strike had unanimous support from the rank and file, or was it being used as a stepping stone for a hot-headed union man? This ambiguity generated interminable rumours, it did little to end the conflict. But finally, after six weeks of pacing back and forth on the picket line waiting for the elusive settlement, the workers returned to work. The whole college breathed a sigh of relief.

The final settlement of a 12.5 percent wage increase was approximately what the college had originally budgeted for the union, and the budget — a public document — reflected this. Why, then, was there a strike?

Shop Union Steward John Price explained that the union decided to strike "not only because of the substandard wage offer of eight percent that was then on the table, but also because people in the union were damn sick and tired of being ignored by the college. The institution was telling us that we didn't matter very much," he said.

However, Robert Edwards, talking to reporters immediately after the strike was announced, called the strike "unnecessary" and "a great shame. We very much want to talk," he said. Interviewed after the settlement, Edwards acknowledged that the strike forced the administration to change its labor relations and its attitude toward the workers. "This has made us more aware of the fact that when we have a tightly-woven community, we should think particularly hard about how to weave the members of our union into our affairs," he said.

Price agreed that the strike did in some ways change things for the better. "Before the strike, we had virtually no labor relations. Now I think we do," he added.

But how could the strike last six weeks? During the strike, back-lashing and invectiveness from both camps impeded the negotiating process. But more fundamental, it seems the strike's duration is best explained by misunderstandings — or perhaps misdirection — of the negotiators from both sides.

The bombastic rhetoric of the college's negotiators — whose reputation as being loud and abrasive is well-deserved — exacerbated the tension and prolonged the strike. His fiery tirades were surely not representative of the administration's sentiment; but, the union negotiator used them as a rallying point to bring out antagonisms and ultimatums that were invidious to negotiations. As their economic plight worsened, however, the rank and file began to question their negotiator's insistence that the college was attempting to "bust the union". The groundwork for a settlement was ultimately laid when a group of union members superseded negotiators and talked directly to college officials. The strike was settled less than one week after that discussion.

After the workers returned, and especially after Winter break, the strike quickly faded from campus conversation. Indeed, it seemed to go the way of other transient campus issues of years past. During the strike — as in the Ethical Buying and South African debates — some students actively participated in social protest. But after the settlement, the strike, and college labor relations in general, were rarely, if ever, discussed. To many, the workers' presence back at the job implied that the economic settlement also reconciled the personal hostilities precipitated by the six-week walkout.

There is no doubt, however, that the strike of 1980 changed labor relations at Carleton. If nothing else, both the union and the college have realized the costs of antagonism and the benefits of conciliation.

IN MEMORIAM

DACIE MOSES

Reprinted with permission from the Minneapolis Tribune

There were chocolate chips cookies, coffee and cribbage. It was a warm, well-lit place. It's corny, but only through the small details of Dacies's life can we ever hope to describe what she means to us. It is right that we should remember Dacie in such small ways, for her greatest secret was to take small moments and find joy and pride and wisdom in the tiniest of them. We all remember being the only person to show up for practice and playing cribbage with her for a hour. Dacie said she hated old ladies who complained about aches and pains, but she loved "her boys to pieces." Her door was always open, and no matter how poorly we sang she would smile. We remember trying to hold rehearsals without her; how empty the house felt. To know Dacie is to understand. She is gone without great wealth, scientific or artistic achievement, but she left the world a more human, more generous place.

Gridley Hall: End of an Era

When it was dedicated in 1882, Gridley Hall was considered one of the most beautiful dormitories in the Middle West. Now about its Victorian atmosphere clings the aura of hundreds of memories of past freshmen girls. Hardly oppressive is this atmosphere, however, but abounding with the energy of 130 active co-eds. Because most girls spend their first years here, Gridley has acquired a deep sentimental connection in the heart of every East Sider.

I would like to thank the News Bureau and Archives for their time and assistance. I also thank those people who gave me a kind word of support when I needed it, many times it was just that which kept me from going off the deep end.

and so there ain't nothing more to write about and I am rotten glad of it, because if I'd 'a' knowed what a trouble it was to make a book I wouldn't 'a' tackled it, and ain't a-going to no more.

Mark Twain
